

The Mississippi Black Code (1865)

In 1865, southern state governments, elected exclusively by white voters, established a series of laws to regulate the lives of the freedmen (ex-slaves). Known as the Black Codes, these laws granted the freedmen certain rights, such as legalized marriage, ownership of property, and limited access to the courts. But they denied them the right to testify against whites, serve on juries, serve in state militias, or vote. And in response to planters' demands that the freedmen be required to work on plantations, the Black Codes declared that those who failed to sign yearly labor contracts could be arrested and hired out to white landowners. Many northern Republicans believed that these laws violated free labor principles and represented an attempt on the part of white southerners to re-impose slavery under a different name. The Mississippi Black Code, shown below, was a particularly egregious example of racism. Reaction to the codes helped to radicalize Congress, which took greater initiative on Reconstruction policy.
